

The American Revolution and the Habsburg Monarchy, 1763-1795
Jonathan Singerton

Introduction

Chapter One – “England is the Motherland and America the Daughter?” The Rise of Colonial and Revolutionary America in the Habsburg Mind, ca. 1500-1776

Chapter Two – “Angels of the New Republic” Networks of Sympathy for the American Revolution in the Habsburg Monarchy, 1776-1789

Chapter Three – “Some Here Are War for the Part of America” The American Revolution and the Imperial Court at Vienna, 1776-1783

Chapter Four – “The Big and Furious Game” The Difficulty of Habsburg Neutrality in the War of American Independence, 1775-1783

Chapter Five – “The Long, Laborious, and Most Odious Task” The First Struggle for Recognition between the Habsburg Monarchy and the United States of America, 1776-1779

Chapter Six – “Wedded to the System They Have Embraced” The Habsburgs as Mediators and Profiteers in the War of American Independence, 1780-1783

Chapter Seven – “A New Set of Merchants” The Development of Post-War Commerce between the Habsburg Monarchy and the United States of America, 1783-1785

Chapter Eight – “If His Imperial Majesty Should Think Fit” The First Habsburg Representatives in the United States of America, 1783-1789

Chapter Nine – “A Trifling Personage” Thomas Jefferson and the Second Struggle for Recognition between the Habsburg Monarchy and the United States of America, 1785-1786

Epilogue – “I am Happy Only When I can Find a New World for Myself” The Residue of Revolution in the Habsburg Lands, 1787-1795